

Am I eligible to play Treasure Hunt?

As long as you're at least 13 years old, your finger's not broken, and you live above ground in the United States or Canada (excluding Quebec), you can scrounge around the map of Islandia and dig for buried treasure under them thar pixels.

Scurvy knaves living in America are allowed to play the game and without being subjected to an IQ test or a finger dexterity examination if they win; but Canadian law requires its residents to pass a timed skills test before they will be permitted to collect a prize. Don't blame our Pirate Captain for that one: he didn't write that law!

Equally unfair (in our wretched little minds) are the guidelines that prohibit employees, officers, and directors of iwin.com and its parent companies and subsidiaries from earning making a single icoi from this game. That prohibition extends all the way to our parents, their parents, our children, our brothers and sisters, and our pets, and our live-together boyfriends or girlfriends. (Sorry about that, honey!) If you ever wanted to see a dedicated pirate crew looking for buried treasure, though, you ought consider coming to work for this dot.com company. We have a scurviness skills test that will put the Canadian test to shame.

To cash in on the loot you find, you have to agree that our Sponsor is the boss and what he says goes. While we're quite sure that he won't make you walk you the plank if you win big, he will want to make sure you're eligible to play and take a mug shot for promotional purposes. If you're really concerned about the legalities, read the fine print in the Official Rules. [Derrick, please create a link the words "Official Rules" to the web page containing them.]

Actually, don't sweat the small stuff; you're better off using your time digging for treasure. Go play! Now! You don't want to keep our cantankerous, but charming Pirate Captain waiting! He might not give you any good clues to find the treasure.
